To steal your own word: Boffo!

It sounds great. I love the fact you used a Flying V in the vid. It's such a great guitar, stradling the line between ridiculous and awesome.

Good demo! But I miss a few variations. We hear two good sound settings, but the potential of the pedal is for sure higher! I'd like to demo that one!

very nice.... now that's my kindof distortion... very responsive to picking and nice and glassy with the harmonix.. I mean that in a good way. Nice and crunchy sound while still retaining the original notes.

It also seems to have a good deal of low end clarity, maybe you could make a bass version of it.

Actually, if you want one (serial number "DIRK") I can do that...

I'm gonna have to change the name next production run...

I may be interested in one of these down the track too...

Just my two cents here:

I suppose all the PCBs for your FDD pedals are already made? If not: if a bass version with more low end needs just another capacitor or a minor circuit change, it was great if there was an onboard switch inside to switch between the guitar and the bass version. If you're still able to implement something like this, go for it, Laurie!

(Why do ideas like this one always pop up afterwards...?)

I appreciate the thinking around a bass version... But my philosophy is every pedal should "do one thing, and do it well". In my world, a bass pedal is a separate device, not something that can be "bolted on" or switched to.

It will take time and R&D effort to make a bass pedal that is worthy of the DingoTone logo, and I already know that the difference between a standard FDD and a bass FDD will be more than a minor curcuit change - certainly more than can be accomodated with a switch.

I usually play bass when I am in a band, so I know what's needed (I have a Stingray5 and a Warwick Thumb and use an Eden rig). When I do a bass pedal, it will be a bass pedal, and it's going to sound good Okay, in the meanwhile I lean back and wait for the upcoming DingoTone Bass Overdrive pedal.

I just like the idea of "hidden" features. I still think an onboard resonance potentiometer in the Liquid Gold Phaser was a pretty good thing!

Sounds great with the V and the Fender amp.... the first riff sounds like the Reverend Billy G starting off 'Jesus just left chicago'..... ....

I'll get back to you on that, I have a few ideas about the "perfect" bass distortion pedal myself.

But apparantly, there are more members interested.

Thanks!

There is a phaser (LGP - Liquid Gold Phaser) in prototype. It is in the queue and should be in field test in April.

After that I'm not sure what's next... possibilities are:
- optical compressor
- tremolo/pan
- flanger

I'm leaning toward the compressor, but could go toward the tremolo/pan. What are everyone's thoughts? Keep in mind it needs to be something with a wide appeal...

Plus I'll be working on a delay in the background - it will be a long time coming though because of the development work required. It will be digital but with analogue repeats, like the DD-2, but with a few enhancements.

Hah! I thought you won't come up with stereo pedals!?

How about an overdrive with a decent tube? Or has this been done too often by other corporations?

I've got to say, I have WAY too many distortion pedals, but If you made a chorus or flanger, I'd consider XD. Of course, I know you can't just MAKE one. I know it takes time, but keep us updated

I don't think a tube is necessary. The BSD has everything you need....

I know you are poking me, but one in/two out isn't "stereo" - not in the manner a stereo phaser would be.

I would go with the Tremolo
